letter from the Chief Pharmacist

I remembered growing up my brother had severe seizures. He was diagnosed with epilepsy at the age of 5 or so. My family tried every thing to cure my brother including traditional medicine but year from year my brother got worse and worse and my parents didn't know what to do for him. My mother blamed my brothers worsening disease on his mismanagement of medications amongst other things and that drew me to medicine. I can sum up my love of being a pharmacist in one word really: opportunity. I am not just talking about the financial or career path opportunities. I am talking about the social, cultural, educational, and enriching opportunities that can otherwise be easy to miss in everyday life. I love being a pharmacist because it allows me to use my knowledge, abilities, and talents to improve patient outcomes in my community. Ethiopia's main public health problems include HIV/Aids, malaria, respiratory infections and perinatal conditions. Infant mortality is 90.23 per 1,000 live births and one in every 8 children does not survive to its fifth birthday. Diseases that we take for granted as curable remain major killers in Ethiopia.

Widespread poverty along with general low-income levels of the population, low education levels especially among women, inadequate access to clean water and sanitation facilities and poor access to health services have contributed to the high burden of ill health in the country. This situation is further aggravated by the high population growth. Young people constitute one third of the total population in Ethiopia. This implies profound reproductive health needs. Nutritional disorders rank among the top problems affecting the population. Malaria remains the major causes of morbidity as well as mortality in the country. There is prevalence rate of 7.3% for cardio-vascular diseases, hypertension, asthma, epilepsy, cancer and diabetes mellitus. Studies have also indicated that the prevalence of mental health problems range. Ethiopia is also known to have one of the highest levels of road traffic accident in the world. All this conditions indicate that there is a major work to be done in Ethiopia and it is the responsibility of every Ethiopian but mostly it is the responsibility of health care professionals in Ethiopia and around the world to help alleviate this problem.

Yours Sincerely
